RE: Findings from a New Survey in Nevada

In our new survey¹ among likely voters, conducted on behalf of First Five Action Fund, Nevadans have a clear and strong two-pronged message about the reconciliation package under consideration: they believe that the legislation should lower costs for families; and they believe that lowering the cost of child care rivals climate change and prescription drug prices in importance for inclusion in this legislation.

Nevadans widely support legislation that will lower costs for families, including making child care more affordable. Lowering costs for families is a prime goal for voters right now: fully nine in 10 (91%) say that “the cost of living for families, including the cost of rent, groceries, and child care” is a big problem. As such, the overwhelming majority of voters favor legislation that takes specific steps to address the problem.

Wide Support for Proposed Legislation

Legislation that would lower the cost of prescription drugs, address climate change by increasing the use of clean energy, and make child care more available and more affordable for families

Support for such legislation is significant across the electorate, including in all types of communities. And, notably, it is especially high among swing voters (those who identify neither as strong partisans nor at the ideological poles):

	Favor %	Oppose %	Net +/-
Democrats	91	7	+84
Republicans	47	44	+3
Swing voters	73	21	+52
Men	62	29	+33
Women	74	23	+51
18 to 39	85	11	+74
40 to 59	65	28	+37
60 and older	58	37	+21
Urban residents	70	27	+43
Suburban residents	66	27	+39
Small town/rural residents	67	25	+41

By more than two to one, voters say this legislation should include child care, despite the cost. Two in three voters say this is the case:

Voters Want Child Care Included in the Legislation

Do you think the legislation...

Again, this sentiment crosses partisanship—88% of Democrats, 70% of swing voters, and a 48% plurality of Republicans say child care ought to be included. It is also notable that both parents (69%) and those without children (66%) say child care should be included.

Indeed, child care rivals the other two elements of the legislation in importance, in voters' estimation: 76% say it is important for the legislation to lower the cost of child care, compared with 88% who say it is important to reduce the cost of prescription drugs and 61% who say it is important to address climate change.

Both the need for and the benefits of child care are apparent to voters.

The need:

- Fifty-seven percent (57%) say the only way to meet demand for child care and ensure its affordability is for the government to take action; only 34% believe cost and availability will improve on their own.
- Half (49%) of all voters say they, a coworker, or a friend or family member has had trouble finding child care in the past several years. That includes 32% of parents who say this applies to themselves.

The benefits:

- Three in four (74%) voters say that child care and early learning programs are a good investment of taxpayers' money (including 55% who say it is a very good investment). Even 59% of those who say federal spending is too high believe child care to be a good investment.
- Seventy-six percent (76%) agree that their community would benefit from child care being more available and affordable—a number that is consistent regardless of the type of community (urban, suburban, rural) in which they live.
- Seventy-one percent (71%) agree that more available and affordable child care will help the economy recover from the pandemic by helping people get back to work.

Nevadans would be unhappy with their member of Congress if child care is not included in this legislation. Sixty-two percent (62%) of voters say they would be disappointed (44%) or upset (18%) with their member of Congress if their member votes to approve legislation that excludes child care. A large majority of Democrats (77%) feel this way, as do a plurality (47%) of Republicans. Notably, 61% of swing voters say they, too, would be disappointed or upset.
