

The First Five Things To Know About:

A New Poll Showing Alabama Voter Support For Child Care Funding

In July 2023, Public Opinion Strategies completed a poll on behalf of the First Five Years Fund, examining Alabama voters' attitudes toward the issue of child care and early childhood education programs. The poll surveyed a national audience as well as voters in Arizona, Montana, Nevada, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia.

The Bottom Line: The vast majority of Alabama voters continue to feel a sense of urgency around the need for affordable, quality child care. This concern cuts across party lines and spans state borders. It is felt strongly by parents and non-parents alike. As a result, even among concerns about the federal deficit, there continues to be persistent, substantial voter support for increased federal funding for child care and early learning programs.

Here are the First Five Things To Know about voter support for federal funding for child care in Alabama:

1

The vast majority of voters nationwide believe it is important for working parents of young children to be able to find and afford quality child care programs. A full 95% believe this is important, but fully 68% say it is extremely important, and the overall sentiment clearly cuts across party lines, with 94% of both Republicans and Independents and 96% of Democrats saying finding quality child care programs for children or working parents is important.

2

Voters believe federal funding for child care and early learning programs should be increased. Even after acknowledging concerns about the federal deficit, 74% of Alabama voters say they still believe that "increasing funding for child care and early childhood education programs is an important priority and a good use of tax dollars." Again, this sentiment cuts across party lines, with 65% of Republican voters, 75% of Independent voters and 89% of Democratic voters agreeing on the issue.

3

Alabama voters believe that resources directed to child care and early learning programs benefit not just the family, but the overall community. Fifty-seven percent of Alabama voters say that resources directed to child care and early learning programs benefit both the individual family/children and the overall community, while 17% say the resources only benefit the community and 15% say they only benefit the individual family.

There is broad support for each of five child care policy proposals tested. Alabama voters provide clear bi-partisan support to each of five child care reform policies proposed. Each proposal wins easily across gender and generational lines, as well as across both ideological and partisan lines. In fact, even '24 Trump voters provide at least 72% support for each of the five policies tested. These include:

- Providing tax incentives to businesses which provide or help their employees find and afford quality early childhood education programs – 83% support (including 79% of Republicans and 89% of Democrats)
- Increasing the federal funding to states to expand current programs that directly help low-income children (also known as the Child Care & Development Block Grant, or CCDBG) – 81% support (including 73% of Republicans and 89% of Democrats)
- Providing greater funding to Head Start and Early Head Start to support families with the greatest needs. – 81% support (including 70% of Republicans and 90% of Democrats)
- Increasing the Child Tax Credit, a tax benefit for families with children which can be used on any household expense – 79% support (including 73% of Republicans and 86% of Democrats)
- Increasing the tax credit specifically designed to help working parents offset the cost of child care (also known as the Child and Dependent Care Tax Credit, or CDCTC) – 77% support (Including 71% of Republicans and 85% of Democrats)

5

One reason for such strong and broad support – Alabama voters recognize the impact that child care can have on a family's household economy. Previous polling has shown that business owners and voters feel strongly that child care is important for the local and national economy. In this poll, we see it hits even closer to home. Fully one-third of Alabama voters polled said they or a family had to miss work because of child care issues, while 14% of all Alabama voters say they have missed or cut back on work because of child care issues. Finally, half of non full-time working parents say they would go back to work full-time if their child had access to quality child care at a reasonable cost.

In Their Own Words

Nearly 80% of voters support increasing federal funding for states to expand their child care programs, (also known as the Child Care & Development Block Grant, or CCDBG), including 62% of Republicans, 82% of Independents, and 90% of Democrats.

Here's what they had to say:

- "It gives parents a bit of breathing room in expenses and being able to afford quality care for their families and all of the issues that go with it." – Strong GOP, Male, Huntsville-Decatur-Florence DMA
- "Having been in a situation with limited income and needed child care, I realize how difficult it is. Sometimes the care one can afford is not a learning experience for the child, nor a safe environment. Knowing there could be additional money to help families get better education for their children is a win, win for all." – IND, Female, MontgomerySelma DM

Putting It All In Context, From FFYF

Sarah Rittling, Executive Director, First Five Years Fund: “We’ve seen a lot of polling through the years that underscores the importance of child care. What this poll tells us is that, both nationally and in these states, voters expect something to be done about the very real issues that families are facing. Members of Congress are making decisions right now about funding for the coming year, and it’s clear from these results that early care and learning programs are not only popular across the entirety of the political spectrum, but that voters want them prioritized.”
